Conductive hearing loss occurs when sound is not transmitted effectively through the outer ear canal to the eardrum and the tiny bones of the middle ear. Sensorineural hearing loss, the most common form, is usually caused by damage to the hair cells in the inner ear or the auditory nerve. Mixed hearing loss is a combination of both types. For instance, a friend of mine, who experienced sudden sensorineural hearing loss, found it increasingly challenging to engage in conversations at social gatherings. This underscores the importance of addressing hearing loss promptly to avoid further complications in communication and social interactions.
